North of MARYJAYOUN, LEBANON, 15 June 1941:

Foreseen to be a military parade, the invasion of Lebanon by Commonwealth and Free French troops became a persistent battle. Not in the least neutral and passive, the Vichy forces prepared to counter-attack after their initial surprise. On 10 June, the Australians advancing on Beirut seized Marjayoun. This city became one of the Vichy objectives, as they were seeking to cut the communication lines of their adversaries. Some R35s of 6th African Armored Regiment (RCA), the 2nd Battalion of 29th Algerian Infantry Regiment (RTA), and some artillery formed up on the 14th, in preparation for a counter-attack the next morning. The northern approach to the city, Balate Ridge, was held by the English of the First Cavalry Division, who had just swapped their horses for trucks. The French attack began around 1400, when the 7th Company of 2nd Battalion of 19th RTA advanced on the ridge and the 5th Company moved on the left in the valley. The tanks of Captain Bellegarde came under withering artillery and antitank fire and had to withdraw. But the Greys retreated in the face of the Algerian skirmishers despite receiving the reinforcement of the Yeomanry and their machineguns. The portees abandoned the position when the R35s returned in force. The 5th Company then took the foot of the ridge in order to participate directly in its assault, supported by artillery.

AFTERMATH: Well led by several energetic officers, the French infantry pushed back the English cavalry, who revealed themselves to be mediocre infantry. The carriers which brought reinforcements into the Debbine Valley clashed with the Algerian Skirmishers. They retreated and regrouped along with a company of Australian infantry under Lieutenant Mayberry, and took position north of the village of Debbine around 1730. Despite the absence of cooperation between the 2nd Battalion and the tanks, the ridge was taken by the French by 1900. The Greys and the Yeomanry withdrew in disorder and abandoned its prisoners. The 7th Company continued its advance and chased the Australians out of Debbine. But it was too late to hope to take Marjayoun before nightfall. For their part, the Anglo-Australian forces finally evacuated the city in favor of a position further south. The Vichy forces occupied their objective the next morning, but despite this first success, the French counter-offensive lacked drive and would not go much further.
